when someone says to you,
you should run for office and change things
do you ever get that tingly whisper that you'd rather be a dictator? "enlightened despot" as it were? then just repatriate & rematriate Africa & induce global justice.

My favorite meat is hot dog @kdc

Like I don't think people get that Black women don't turn out because of some maternal instinct to save everyone. We get usually hit first and worst by oppressive policies so we are saving ourselves. You just benefit.

Joanne Hammond @KamloopsArchaeo · 13 Dec 2017

I'm so glad @ozhibiiige and @APTNNews looked at this issue. FNMI people have been very clear, for a long time, about these open cultural wounds.

Now archaeologists, academics, regulators and politicians need to put our own consciences & $ to work to support rematriation. 14/14

If you oppose decolonization through the rematriation of Indigenous lands, because you fundamentally come at this from a place of white supremacist ignorance (and this applies even if you are Black or PoC, because you too can apply these WS logics), DO BETTER.

Hey, uhhhhh.

Maybe non-indigenous people — especially us white ones — should consider literally not attempting to equate decolonisation, rematriation of stolen land, and indigenous liberation struggles; with ethno-nationalism or "blood and soil".

You know. Just a thought.

The stereotype of the "good mother", a racist, classist and sexist Western social construct, is especially problematic. The good mother always acts in caring and self-sacrificing ways toward her children.²⁵ The stereotype of "bad mother" is defined as the polar opposite of the good mother. She is unable to control her selfish impulses.²⁶

Indigenous mothers are particularly impacted by these stereotypes. At times, they are unable to meet the dominant cultural and middle class expectations which underlie the good mother stereotype due to the realities of poverty, racism, heterosexism, and violence.²⁷ The good mother stereotype also positions the heterosexual nuclear family as the value-neutral norm for child care. This fails to account for the culturally different forms of child care practiced in Indigenous communities, which emphasize responsibilities owed by extended family and community based on kinship.²⁸

What's worse is these stereotypes prevent Indigenous peoples from defending themselves. The good mother is demure; she fights for her kids, but she must do so in the "right" way, by atoning for her sins and exorcising her life of bad influences. She must certainly not draw media attention to her cause; doing so would turn the case into a political issue to the detriment of the child's wellbeing.²⁹ In other words, the good mother stereotype reinforces colonialism by sanctioning Indigenous female resistance.

The article explores two intertwined ideas: that the United States is a settler colonial nation-state and that settler colonialism has been and continues to be a gendered process. The article engages Native feminist theories to excavate the deep connections between settler colonialism and heteropatriarchy, highlighting five central challenges that Native feminist theories pose to gender and women's studies. From problematizing settler colonialism and its intersections to questioning academic participation in Indigenous dispossession, responding to these challenges requires a significant departure from how gender and women's studies is regularly understood and taught. Too often, the consideration of Indigenous peoples remains rooted in understanding colonialism as an historical point in time away from which our society has progressed. Centering settler colonialism within gender and women's studies instead exposes the still-existing structures of settler colonialism and its powerful effects on Indigenous peoples and settlers. Taking as its audience practitioners of both "whitestream" and other feminisms and writing in conversation with a long history of Native feminist theorizing, the article offers critical suggestions for the meaningful engagement of Native feminisms. Overall, it aims to persuade readers that attending to the links between heteropatriarchy and settler colonialism is intellectually and politically

Canada replaced existing forms of Aboriginal government with relatively powerless band councils whose decisions it could override and whose leaders it could depose.⁴ In the process, it disempowered Aboriginal women, who had held significant influence and powerful roles in many First Nations, including the Mohawks, the Carrier, and Tlingit.⁵
